Berlin stages light festival despite energy

Berlin opened its annual Festival of Lights with colourful projections on key monuments Friday but has deployed major power-saving measures as Germany grapples with an energy crisis linked to the war in Ukraine.

The event, first held in 2005 and running until October 16, draws more than two million spectators to the German capital each autumn, according to organisers.

Critics had urged the private consortium behind the festival to call it off this year, saying it set a bad example while the country tries to wean itself off Russian energy with conservation measures.
